The source of data will be in excel though, so my first thought was to create a table of all of the.sql procs and create a mapping between where the values in the excel should be placed and the procs. As the process of getting data into the excel and the sprocs is going to be complicated I thought I would try to use a script to do it. How is this better done than mapping tables to sprocs though? A: Don't do this. There are two reasons: 1) You can't script SQL Server. I know that's hard to believe. Ok, maybe you can with AdventureWorks or something... that's different. But scripts? Nope. 2) There's no point to it. SQL Server is a declarative language. You tell it what to do, not how. Basically, what your problem is, is you have a bunch of stored procedures that you want to update. But... they are already updated. So... why update them? I'd suggest that you take your existing data, model it in your Excel spreadsheet, use SSIS to import the data to a staging database, then run the stored procedures on that database. Once that is done, simply update the data to the target database, and delete the data in the staging table. This is how they relate to each other: Travel hasMany Hotel, Hotel belongsToTravel, Travel hasMany Rating, Rating belongsToHotel Travel hasMany Rating, Rating belongsToHotel Rating belongsToUser The Rating model has a foreign key to both user and hotel The two main thing I want to do is get all ratings for a given hotel, sorted by their value.
