What are the dangers inherent in that situation? The author of that statement, Tim O'Reilly, explains in this talk at Google I/O '09. "I think Tim has it pretty right. There's a problem in the world, and he's trying to solve it. The way he's doing that is by playing the role of the guy who sees the problem, but, by definition, he can't see the solution. If you're running a problem-solving business, that's how you try to do it, and when you have two such people, they just go around in circles, and there is no resolution. "I am not so sure we need an app store. There are other solutions out there, but there's something in there that is "right." I do think that the friction has been removed from building apps. It used to be you went to an Apple store and you were restricted to the apps they thought you should see, and you had to make a decision between what is important to you and what was important to them. "Now, you can have an app store, but it's your app store. You can make it an iPhone-only app store, you can make it an Android-only app store. You can make it an Android-only app store. You can make it an Android phone and a Windows phone app store. The app store is just a tool. It's not a key to everything. Just as the web was a way to get information, it's just a way to get content, and it's a new way to get information in the business world. I'm not quite sure it's a permanent solution, but I think it's here to stay." Many developers want to build applications on the Microsoft Windows platform, but fear they won't find a good developer community to support their efforts. This is something that I hear a lot as I travel around the world helping Windows developers improve their craft. In this talk, I will share some of the pain points I've encountered when trying to find and work with other Microsoft Windows developers. "Every developer thinks they're a Microsoft Windows developer. I got to be honest; you look at me and I look like I'm a Windows developer. I've got the tools, I've got the beard, I'm wearing a little Windows shirt.

I'm probably doing some kind of Windows development. And yet,
