For immediate release, KANTUDA has announced the release of the first stable version of its Pocket Browser App Beta. The Beta version of the app is compatible with the following Android versions: 2.2 Froyo, 2.3 Gingerbread, and 2.3.3 Jelly Bean. KANTUDA has also released the milestone version for the Android M release, which will be released later this year. The Pocket Browser App Beta is a fork of the Android Browser application, that automatically redirects the user's access to the internet to a customized or personalized version. The KANTUDA Pocket Browser App Beta is based on the pioneering approach to the development of unified smartphones, consisting of an Android kernel, a customized Android ROM and a customized user interface. The app is also compatible with the Symbian UI QWERTY and the Sidekick OS v1.0. The app is being currently developed only in English. The development of the app is planned to be integrated in other languages in the future. The app has the following main features: Advanced data protection and data encryption, thanks to a private encrypted environment within the app. An automatic redirection system to secure and fast access to the Google Play Store, Wikipedia, Netflix, Pandora and other services. Offline content, thanks to the powerful Cloud Service, that gives the app the ability to synchronize the apps content with the server, without the need to download it. A widget that can be placed anywhere on the phone. The widget can be configurable. Supports smartphones with a QWERTY keyboard, and smartphone with a Sidekick OS v1.0. The KANTUDA Pocket Browser App Beta is currently available at the Google Play Market. A compatible version for Symbian devices will be released soon. Klout is a new system that evaluates the "social graph" that we see online and determines the real-world influence of a Twitter user. Klout puts the person back in the driver's seat, allowing them to decide their Klout score, only for it to be determined by an algorithm. This sounded like a really great idea – but then I started wondering, what exactly does it mean for me to have "real-world influence"? Twitter has always been about who you know, not necessarily about what you know, but now I fear that Klout will use the very tools we've developed over the years to construct a world-wide algorithm
