8.27.2011 If you've ever done any sort of political protest activity in the last 15 years you've probably used the word "courage". It's a pretty useful word. But if you haven't, I'll be happy to explain. The word "courage" has entered our vocabulary in a few different contexts. It's common, for example, to describe someone's action as "courageous" if they go in to the financial industry and ask for help when they're too scared to do anything else. What's your reaction to that? Do you think that person is courageous? Most of us would say yes. Like most of us, the person in question would probably also say that they're simply asking for help. Most of us probably wouldn't call their request for help "lacking in courage", but the act of actually running into a financial institution (let alone walking in and asking for a loan) may be dangerous or challenging for someone who's not comfortable approaching people in a financial institution. It's the same when it comes to protesting. The idea of a protest puts a lot of people on edge. The idea of a violent protest is even more scary. If someone's trying to get you to participate in a protest against the current government, they may well be trying to give you the impression that doing so is too dangerous. That's why protest organizers use the term "courageous". Protest organizers are using "courageous" to refer to the fact that protesters are willing to risk their safety and their lives doing something that's considered to be dangerous by most people. This is an important distinction. The use of the word "courage" to describe a protest is usually directed at people who have the "courage" to seek out violent protesters, simply because they feel that something needs to be done. Of course, the side of the protest that is being criticised in this context may also put people on edge. That's why protest organizers also say that the protesters are "courageous". When people criticise "disobedient students", we're not criticizing students who are standing up to their school administrators. When protesters are being accused of lying about genocide, we're not criticizing people who are standing up to people trying to end the lives of others. We're not using the term "courageous" when we're referring to a group of people who show up for a peaceful protest

Google+ Followers Friday, April 20, 2012 Crochet Pants with Rockstar Bias My daughter, who is a bit of a mini me, asked me to make her some pants. Okay, she requested she could have the pattern, but I had a feeling I could make them myself. I also got her the new Rockstar Bias yarn she wants to start working on her own. The pattern is from Debbie Bliss Style and Sport. I left off the hem at the leg. It was so easy to do and didn't require a lot of stretch fabric. I finished them the day they were supposed to be ready. I changed the buttonhole, instead of single, I changed it to double. I like how they turned out. I was hoping they would fit, but they are a bit tight. I was hoping they would stretch out a bit. Oh well, she was pleased. I had some problems with the yarn. The second row was much harder to do than the first. I couldn't count properly and decided to practice it before the next pair. It is too bad I couldn't keep the pattern as I changed it. I decided it would be better to have less to learn at one time. They are a bit scratchy and now I am cross eyed from trying to see
