The grand jury that decided not to bring charges against any Ferguson police officers in the shooting death of 18-year-old Michael Brown has recommended that the Department of Justice open a civil-rights investigation into the department and city, a spokesperson for the agency said Thursday. "This is a significant step forward. Not only is the Department looking into the police officer-involved shooting death of Michael Brown, but we are also evaluating the potential for civil rights violations by the Ferguson Police Department," said a Justice Department spokeswoman, Nellie Huerta. The decision was made Thursday by the St. Louis County grand jury that convened in the case and heard evidence for about six weeks. Attorney General Eric Holder, whose office will ultimately decide whether to pursue a civil-rights prosecution, said in a statement that the Justice Department would carefully examine the evidence collected by local authorities. "The grand jury's decision not to indict Ferguson police officer Darren Wilson for the shooting death of Michael Brown raises serious questions about how this tragedy could have occurred," Holder said. "The Justice Department's
