Q: What's the difference between a custom button control and a standard button control? I was wondering if there's any difference between a custom button control and a standard button control. By standard I mean the standard controls in the System.Windows.Forms.Control. A: Apart from constructor you are using Custom Control means you have to write some code. Standard Controls do not give you this ability to make your own. If you use Button in my program I can write: Button b = new Button(); If I do something like this in form code: Button b = new Button(); It will throw some Invalid Operation Exception because it is standard control. If you want to create your own control you have to inherit the control like: public class CustomButton : Button { //Customizing your own code here } and you must have to code to create custom controls. A: A custom control should be a control in its own right. You can subclass Button and expose a new property/method that would make it appear like it is your own button. A: A custom control is one that you create yourself. You then implement methods/properties that are "special" to your control as opposed to the standard Windows forms controls. See this article for a good example of creating a custom control. The pertinent point is that you define a "Draw" method on it which you then override for the button that you are creating. Also, check out Mark's answer: import path from 'path' import Checkout from 'checkout' import React from'react' import { login } from './lib/login' import Kb from './lib/kb' import './stylesheets/swal.css' let user, session export function mountSwal(confirm, onCancel, onConfirm) { login(confirm.displayType, confirm.mfaConfirm).then( (user) => { session.user = user session.show = confirm.mfaConfirm || confirm.enterShow session.action = confirm.action || confirm.redirectAction if (confirm.enterShow)
