THOUGHTS OF THE PLAYER0170313444ErosanPCThu, 18 Dec 2013 17:31:06 -0500>Midkine regulates aortic valve function and VEGF expression in cholesterol-fed rabbits. Experimental models for systemic sclerosis (SSc) and atherosclerosis feature similar clinical manifestations, such as chronic inflammation, and fibrosis. Because both diseases share the same pathophysiologic feature of monocyte/macrophage infiltration, inflammation and oxidative stress, we postulate that inflammatory mediators may contribute to the pathogenesis of SSc and atherosclerosis. We investigated the effects of midkine (MK) on cardiac functions and the expression of vascular endothelial growth factor (VEGF) in cholesterol-fed rabbits, and explored the potential relationship between MK and VEGF. Rabbits received vitamin D3 in their food or diet with 0.5% cholesterol and 20 IU vitamin D3/kg chow (diet or cholesterol group) for 21 days, with 20 IU vitamin D3/kg in different groups (diet/omac for 21 days [diet plus vehicle] or cholesterol/omac for 21 days [cholesterol plus vehicle]). MK administration in cholesterol-fed rabbits promoted aortic valve function, as evidenced by an increase in aortic peak and mean pressure, systolic and diastolic functions, as well as an increase in the wall-to-diaientiumlumen ratio. Importantly, administration of MK significantly increased VEGF expression in the aortic valve endothelium (E) of cholesterol-fed rabbits. These data suggest that MK affects aortic valve function through VEGF induction, potentially contributing to the pathogenesis of valvular dysfunction in SSc patients.
