For determining physical parameters of a sample to be measured, the sample is irradiated by a polarized beam of radiation, for example, X-rays, an X-ray beam is utilized to detect and to measure a characteristic of the sample material according to the polarization direction of the radiation. Such polarization detection is well known as conventional X-ray photoelectron spectroscopy (XPS) in which a beam of X-rays is used for photoexciting the electrons from the sample, which are then received by a surface-sensitive X-ray detector. However, there is a need for sample measurements at large sample volume in which the sample to be measured is located very close to the detection device. In order to measure a large sample volume, the detector has to be precisely positioned relative to the sample volume. To achieve this, the illumination volume is relatively large. In the conventional XPS, a strongly focused X-ray beam is used for this purpose which illuminates a sample that is located in the region of the beam focus. In order to measure this volume, the beam is restricted in size and the distance between the sample and the lens that provides the focused beam is approximately 10 mm. To generate the X-ray beam, a laser pulse is generally used to generate X-rays. As lasers typically have high divergence, the X-rays emitted by the laser have to be collimated. A lens is used to focus the collimated beam on the sample to be measured. At the edge of the lens, the beam divergence leads to a reduction of the penetration depth. If the measurement depth of the sample is large, it may be important that the penetration depth is larger than or equal to the sample thickness. Therefore, a beam size of approximately 5 mm is often used. The distance between sample and lens is typically 5 to 10 mm. The use of X-ray radiation for detecting radiation generated by the sample material has also been described. In this method, the X-rays are emitted by the sample material itself and are detected by a detector. An exemplary X-ray detector of this type is a scintillator. The detected X-ray radiation is then used for measuring the physical parameters of the sample material. In the conventional methods, a focused beam is normally used in which a lens is located within the illumination volume for focusing the beam on the surface of the sample to be measured. For measuring the sample volume closer to the lens than the lens itself, the penetration depth of the measurement beam will be
