Still I have to. (presumably "John" was the Nucleos programmer) (some rough text) A: The first document is a line drawing of the chip's circuit. It's being used as a reference. The second document shows the chip's register layout. This won't be found in the AVR-Libc, since it's not really a part of it. The last document shows how to use the registers. Note that the register names are printed in 1D font which is very difficult to read for normal humans. You have to realize that this is for a low-memory chip. The part of the manual where it talks about the registers it lists their names in a cross-reference column. The first document gives an overview about the chip. The "register map" is a picture of the chip's registers. These are the things you can access as instruction for example, without having to manually give it an address (like in the
