Here's what I have: #!/bin/bash if [ -z $1 ]; then echo "1. $_ is not defined" fi When I execute the script with no arguments, I would expect it to complete and give the '1. not defined' response, but instead it just hangs. What am I doing wrong? A: Scripts that use [ -z $1 ] make that call a bash builtin, which is a feature that any terminal emulator can take advantage of. See the bash reference manual section on Builtins for details. That means that when the script isn't executed in a shell (e.g., by running it at the command line) you can see that it's stuck waiting for input by opening another shell and trying to run the script from there, and you'll see that your script has just hang. The solution is to use a shell builtin only when you're executing the script from the shell. To do so, use test "$1" and then test "$1" -z to run that comparison from a shell, or use set -eu to set the bash option exit on error and use if [ ! -z "$1" ] if [ -z "$1" ]; then if [ ! -z "$1" ]; then echo "1. $_ is not defined" fi fi if test "$1" -z; then if test "$1" -z; then echo "1. $_ is not defined" fi fi 1.
