The language of Photoshop is only one element that makes this software a favorite among photographers and other image-makers. There is also the creative scope with a plethora of editing options for creating new features such as curves, red-eye reduction, creating and modifying masks, and many others. A picture is worth a thousand words, right? But what does Photoshop actually look like and what is that "Photoshop look" that is so synonymous with the software? Here are some examples of what Photoshop can do to images.

6 Ways Photoshop Changes a Photo

1. Colors Sometimes an image looks lifeless or flat because the colors didn't have much contrast. When looking at this image, the eyes tend to focus on the area where the colors are devoid of hues. All photos are full of color, but an image may lack contrast to other colors or the entire image. One way to bring back the "life" to an image is to increase the contrast and enhance the blacks and whites. This makes the eyes focus more on the picture and less on the colors. Another way is to use filters and tools that can add more color back into your image.
2. The Intensity of Colors Sometimes an image just looks dark or dull. Adding a color cast to a photograph can lighten up the tones and make the colors look brighter, more vibrant. Look at this photograph and imagine a slight color cast on the light blue flowers. This softens the image and makes it more relaxing to look at. For more natural-looking results, use a color cast as it's just as easy as a subtle gray/blue filter on your subject.
3. Exposure Different shutter speeds are exposed differently. The term "overexposure" or "underexposure" refers to having too much light in a photo. It would look bright, and the image would have no detail; that's called "blown out." When doing some Photoshop editing, it's important to make sure that the image doesn't have an overexposed or underexposed area. The rule of thumb is to use something in between the two extremes. This sample image has some areas that are underexposed, which can cause a loss of detail and lack of sharpness, and areas that are overexposed, which can cause a loss of contrast and damage your subject's color.
4. Contrast The brightness or "contrast" of the image
