Quick Music Player

Quick Music Player is yet another application aiming to provide a simple interface to play MP3 files. There's no doubt an overproduction of these applications, and the real problem is most of these don't even count anyway since they offer the exact same type of functionality. No customization and a bare, way too simple interface, are the main attractions with this one. Why another audio player? What you're probably wondering if you've reached this point in the review, is why another sound player? That is what we wondered as we discovered that there really wasn't anything special about this application. One must agree that playing tunes through this application is rather easy, and there are no hiccups whatsoever during playtime. But surely you already know that is simply not enough when talking about an application that offers no special type of functionality. The interface is bare If you thought a simple interface was something to cheer on about, you're going to change your opinion once you see what this app has to offer. Once you populated with tracks, it might start looking decent, but otherwise, it's bare and it's in many ways repulsive. The design is old and worn out. Unless you're desperately looking to grab an application to listen to MP3 files and this is what comes up, there are plenty, better-said tons, of other options for you to choose from. Quick Music Player is way too basic to actually count amongst lots of other players out there. There is not much it has to offer, although the fact that it works without any hitches is in itself something to appreciate. The functionality is there, alright, but by no means is it enough to convince us that it is worth taking into account when compared to any other player out there. When the Apple iPhone 3G was released in June, 2008 by AT&T, there were a good number of other cell phone companies that were extremely interested in the upcoming handset. Of the other four main carriers, Verizon, T-Mobile, AT&T and Sprint, only Sprint was able to announce a deal that would allow them to sell the iPhone in their respective networks. For Sprint however, the deal isn't that much better for them, as they'll have to pay the first year of the phone's $199 price tag in addition to the price of the handset that is already subject to a contract. Gadgets However, this isn't a deal breaker for a lot of people out there, who rather wish to try the iPhone out before committing
