Brush The Brush controls how much of a particular color, texture, or pattern fills the canvas. A brush works by a simple concept. You draw the brush on the canvas, and with every stroke of the brush, the canvas is filled with a certain color, texture, or pattern. Let's say you want to draw a texture on your image. That will give you some idea of how the brush works. You draw a thin line of black, then a line of texture. Then you add a thin line of black over the top, and the area you draw on starts filling with the texture. Just like that, you've created a brush. Now you can change the settings on that brush to determine what you want to happen with the brush and the color it creates. For example, you can change the type of brush to pencil, brush, airbrush, etc., then you can change the settings on a brush to change its size. Let's look at some of the features available when you're using a brush. This is where all the brushes come from. You can open this file and browse the brushes. If you want to see the history of the brush in the Brush menu, click on Brush Settings, and you'll see that there is a history of the brushes you've used. You can apply an Effect to a brush. This allows you to change the look of your brush, like making it thicker or lighter. You can also change the pressure you apply when you brush. Pressing harder will apply a greater amount of texture to your image. If you want a larger amount of texture, you can increase the amount of texture. Let's look at some of the things you can do with a brush. Example 1 Let's look at how you can mix colors and textures on a canvas. This is called layering. You want to build a pile of paper, for example. You start at the bottom of the pile, and as you go up in the pile, you put more and more paper on top. In the same way, you can layer different types of textures and colors. For example, you can start with a boring canvas, add some texture and then add some color. Example 2 Let's use the Watercolor Brush to paint with water. Start with a clean canvas and add some texture. Use the airbrush tool to paint a line down the canvas and change the width of the line to create more or less texture. Example

Q: Why does the rendering/model manager use debug data? I have never used a model manager, and I am currently trying to understand why debug data was added to the model manager rendering package. Why not just specify how to render/display the model or the texture during initialization? A: If the management package is set to none or just creates a model, that does not mean that the contents of the renderer are ignored. Assume for a moment a model with a vertex file that renders to a cube. If the model does not contain texture coordinates, the renderer that generated the cube will render just cubes. Now assume that the model also contains a texture for the cube that contains a texture coordinate that renders the cube into the texture. The renderer should render not only the cube, but also the texture. A model manager does exactly that, it takes a model without any indication about how it should be rendered and provides a renderer interface for the model. NBC's 'The Biggest Loser' (Week 8) This is why I still don't understand why people get so bent out of shape over the so-called "loser" factor. You can't talk to the contestants about the show (not that they want to talk to you) and you can't talk to the trainers about the contestants (not that they want to talk to you). The only way to really know how the contestants are really doing is from their own reaction to how they look physically, but of course we don't get that from the show. The show is great for two things: A) It's a 7:00 pm prime time show. When you're a working parent with a DVR you have to choose what you're going to watch. Knowing that there is a show that can possibly take your 3 or 4 kids out of the house for a couple of hours is a huge part of the equation. B) It is on a station (NBC) that has a wide audience. If you listen to the radio or watch the news, you know that the effects of this show are everywhere. So I have no problem with the trainer or the network putting together an athletic competition where the contestants will feel better about themselves and their life. I do have a problem with these people portraying themselves as the new victims and complaining about the show. They are by far not the poorest people in the country and
