Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a temperature sensor such as a thermistor used in a wide range of temperatures and having a stable temperature-sensing characteristic such as to show a desirable characteristic for a certain temperature range. 2. Description of the Related Art Generally, a thermistor has a high thermal resistance and hence is used in a range of temperatures including high temperatures of more than several hundreds of degrees centigrade. In recent years, in order to cope with a demand for miniaturization of electronic equipments and research and development of organic substances, the temperature within such a device has been raised in the order of several tens of degrees centigrade in addition to higher temperatures. Hence, the thermistor used in such high temperatures is required to have a stable characteristic in a wide temperature range from room temperature to 300 degrees centigrade. FIG. 5 is a sectional view illustrating a portion of a conventional thermistor. This thermistor comprises an insulating substrate 90 made of, for example, alumina ceramics and having a through-hole 80, and a thermistor film 90A, which is formed by forming a thermistor layer 91 made of, for example, silicide on an inner surface of the through-hole 80 and is arranged so as to be in contact with an interior wall surface of the through-hole 80 and to have a stable temperature characteristic in a wide range of from a room temperature to 300 degrees centigrade.

In the conventional thermistor, an area of a sensor element portion is set to as small as possible and the thickness of the thermistor film is made thin in order to heighten the temperature characteristic thereof.

Therefore, it is necessary to increase the resistance in order to secure a required resistance for the temperature characteristic of the conventional thermistor. Recently, as shown in FIG. 6, a bismuth-based thermistor having a high resistance has been developed and put into practical use. However, the aforementioned conventional thermistor is not suitable for use in a high-temperature range or used in a direct current. In addition, since the resistance is small, it is necessary to increase
