Q: How do we know that God is not in the Universe? From the premise that God is not in the Universe, we don't know whether He exists or not. This question is derived from the premise: if the absence of God, then we have no evidence that He exists. I know the question has been asked before, however, I think that the question has a deeper significance since we now have quantum mechanics, which gives us a reason to believe that maybe God does not exist. For an example, what if in the Big Bang God says: "I will not show myself." All you see is waves of energy (light) which interact with each other, but God is not affecting the interaction. Then you would think: "how do we know He is not affecting it?" This question is similar to the question: Why do we know that God doesn't exist? In that case, the answer is philosophical. In the recent case, why do we know He doesn't exist? In the case of a QM universe, why do we know He is not affecting it? A: Anaxagoras said "the world is full of gods." Homer said "the gods look upon everything with the eye of Zeus," and the Epicureans said "God is the cause of motion" which is of course the effect of God's original fiat. What do you think of that? I'm thinking that perhaps, if God is a cause and we can define motion and we can have an idea of even the very tiniest object existing, then even if it is in a quantum world still God caused it to exist, just like He caused the Big Bang and the Sun to exist in the first place. The universe is still a coherent object composed of ordered parts. So not really a problem. I have to ask though; if "God is not in the universe" what does that make us? What if there's a God? Not God the Father, but God as a perfect being. In that case even if God is not in our universe and is not perceivable to us, that does not mean that we can say that "God is not in the universe." He most certainly is, and we can see that with our 5 senses. Do we really have free will? It would be interesting to hear your thoughts on that.

What's New In?

are. There are differences, but they're probably due to differences in the thermal transfer mediums and substrates used. I have a feeling that in this case, the paper is just the shell of the traditional laminate, not unlike how the digipak that comes with CDs and DVDs is just the shell of the case. So there are still layers of inks and thermal transfer medium under the glossy surface, but there's nothing there that would damage the readability. The issue here is that the glossy surface of the CD-R and DVD+R/RW doesn't do much in terms of protecting the disc from outside sources. A cheap CD or DVD case has corners, and covers the front and rear of the disc, but there's no way to prevent the outside from handling the disc. The glossy surfaces are there purely to make it look nice, and it's the outside that has to take care of it. If the Sony disc has this same surface, it's pretty much a given that it will be exposed to outside sources. In many ways, you could say that the Sony disc isn't as safe as the original disc. And that's why there was a fire in a burning circle and the kids and their paint sticks. As long as you don't touch or shake the disc, it should be fine. If you do, though, you're not playing by the same rules as if the disc were store bought. This is the real issue, you know. Not that the process of making copies of a record is illegal. Rather, it's that they're copying from a copy. I've made a ton of CD-Rs on a Hi-Fi CD-R burner that can spin a 300+ RPM. There's only so much that happens when you do that. If you spin the disc really, really fast, it will tend to jump around and suck the ink in a lot faster than a less driven copy. So, there's definitely a point when things like scratching stop being purely for your own personal "fun", and start actually impacting the quality of your transfers. There are differences, but they're probably due to differences in the thermal transfer mediums and substrates used. I have a feeling that in this case, the paper is just the shell of the traditional laminate, not unlike how the digipak that comes with CDs and DVDs is just the shell of the case.
