For three years, salamanders (Ambystoma macrodactylum) collected in a region of the U.S. Midwest that is contaminated with p,p'-dichlorodiphenyl dichloroethylene (DDE) and polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs) were screened for abnormalities in neuromuscular performance, including locomotor function, as related to contaminant exposure. The effects of environmental contaminants on whole animal neuromuscular function, as reflected by their ability to reach a horizontal net position from a straight-line trajectory, were compared with other contaminant-related stressors. A total of 5,140 larvae and larvae/year were screened over the three year period. No significant overall differences in contaminant-related stressor susceptibility were found among species or genders, but a decline in performance was observed over the three year period for all species except the spring-summer-fall terrestrial species (A. macrodactylum, Ophryotrocha hagfishes) in females. Comparisons of the results obtained in this study with recent data from the same species collected from a reference site showed no apparent effects of contaminant exposure on the tested parameters. In fact, salamanders collected from the contaminated site showed relatively higher relative rates of decline than those from the reference site. These results suggest that contaminant-related stressors, such
