Wired magazine did a profile of Google's new "City Hall" in Mountain View. After all, Google bought a building for that purpose, named it "Chinatown" and "Latin America" and then sent robotics engineers to the building all the time. Good PR? Google launched the "City Hall" building Wednesday morning to replace the nearby "20th century" "town square" location. Dave Girard, project manager for the City Hall project, says about half of the rooms are already rented. Full story: City Hall is a combination of what's happening in the new AT&T Center and what Google does in other buildings. Dieter Rams, the designer who defined "good design," designed the interior of the City Hall, while other Google employees designed the outside. A similar project is occurring on the next block of California Street, the "24th Street Project," a new roof structure and an addition to the AT&T Center. Google and its CEO, Eric Schmidt, are dreaming of a "high tech mecca" along the California Street corridor. Google has often been criticized for being anti-union (controversial with immigrant labor and low paid in-the-field workers), which could be
