This paper, a portion of which is the predecessor to a complete manuscript on the pathological findings of the uterine cervix, reviews the epidemiology, pathology, and the evolving approaches to the treatment of carcinoma of the cervix. The following types of carcinoma of the cervix are discussed: adenocarcinoma, squamous cell carcinoma, adenosquamous carcinoma, carcinoma in situ, and leiomyosarcoma.The present disclosure relates generally to dynamic memories and, more specifically, to techniques for identifying a portion of a dynamic memory which has been corrupted during a data read or data write operation. Modern digital data processing systems typically include a dynamic random access memory (DRAM) for storing data and instructions for processing by a processor. Such DRAMs usually include an array of memory cells formed in a semiconductor substrate, with each memory cell including a capacitor that stores a charge indicative of a data bit. The capacitor in each memory cell is coupled to a transistor, which can be a N-channel metal oxide semiconductor (MOS) transistor, through a storage node contact. The word line for the memory cell is coupled to a gate of the transistor, and the bit line is coupled to the drain of the transistor. Data is written to a memory cell by initiating a read operation, coupling the bit line to a sense amplifier, and storing a charge on the capacitor in the memory cell. Data is read from the memory cell by, first, coupling the bit line to the sense amplifier, and coupling the word line to the transistor in the memory cell. In response to these signals, the transistor turns on and reads the data from the capacitor into the bit line. Semiconductor memory devices may occasionally experience a condition known as soft error upset. An upset occurs when a charged particle impacts the memory cell, causing data to be improperly stored in the memory cell. The impact of the charged particle may cause a change in the value of the charge stored on the
