Earth's diameter is 2×10^4 km and its mass is 5×10^{24} kg. A spherical light source is placed inside Earth at its centre, with a radius of 1×10^4 km. Suppose that the source has an intensity of 10^4 W m⁻² and that the source is emitting red light. I) What is the probability that a photon emitted from the centre of the Earth will fall within ± 0.5 km of the centre of Earth. II) If the source was an atom of sodium, what would be the probability that a sodium atom would be found within ± 0.5 km of Earth's centre? My attempt: I) $\Omega = \frac{4\pi}{5 \times 10^{24}}$ dm; $t = \frac{4\pi}{5 \times 10^{24}}$ dm; x, y, z $v = \left(\frac{4\pi}{5 \times 10^{24}} \right) \frac{1}{3} \left(\frac{4}{3} \pi r^3 \right)$ dm; x, y, z $v = 4\pi$ bff6bb2d33

Games I played DAOC Beta (Jester's Back): Add cross-link to the third site I'm trying to put together I have an idea for a trading site called Stoneage Gear that might or might not have any market value. I have a code that you can add to your blog or website that will allow you to link those items from your website or blog posts to that page. If that site sells anything, they will be able to link to it like the merch stores do. To make that work, I need someone to approve the codes of their sites and either they need to link to the page it goes on when they create a blog post of something they're selling, or when they create a blog post they have a link code that includes a link to the page. Quick chicken wings and then I'll post this up to the forums and have it listed as a topic in future contests.

Crescent Bracelet, Sterling Silver This lovely bracelet features the crescent moon symbol that is so beloved by many cultures around the world. The crescent moon is the symbol of the zodiac sign of Cancer. The symbol of Cancer also represents the goddess of the Moon. The moon symbol is also sacred to the ancient Greeks who use it on their coins, and the Taurian branch of the ancient Roman people used it on their coins. It is often associated with a woman's full-moon birthday, and is considered an ideal symbol of fertility, abundance and fullness of life. More than half of all people living with HIV (PLHIV) are women. The unique health needs of women are underscored by their unique roles in HIV transmission, health care, and prevention, as HIV infected women transmit HIV to their partners as often as women infected with other sexually transmitted diseases. Yet, the features of HIV infection that distinguish women from men are not necessarily associated with improved clinical outcomes in the setting of antiretroviral therapy (ART). Treatment of HIV is a true paradigm of a gender-responsive approach. Thus, a better understanding of how women differ from men and how these differences affect their health and treatment outcomes will greatly enhance the successful delivery of ART in women and the prevention of HIV transmission in couples. In addition, sex differences in the human immune system influence the course and treatment outcomes of both HIV infection and other diseases. A deeper understanding of immune differences in men and women may lead to the development of gender-specific diagnostic and therapeutic approaches for common infections and neoplasms. The broad, long-term objectives of this project are to contribute to the understanding of gender differences in HIV infection and the broader areas of HIV prevention and therapy by examining the association of sex hormones with HIV pathogenesis in the setting of ART, and by determining whether sex differences exist in susceptibility to some common infections or induction of autoimmunity in subjects infected with HIV. This project proposes an interdisciplinary approach to the study of women and men living with HIV infection. Core components are a collaborative research group, an advanced training component to develop the scientific skills of highly competent investigators, and a mentorship program for developing young investigators. The research group has a collaborative academic approach to achieve the long-term objectives of this project. This proposal has the following specific aims: 1) To test the hypothesis that in women sex hormones modulate the duration of viral remission following the initiation of ART; 2) To test the hypothesis that in women sex
