One study reported that mothers who received advice to restrict and teach their infants to hold their elbows straight and keep their trunk and legs parallel to the floor, to reduce or eliminate the ability to use multi-joints. As the authors stated, this strategy appeared to become the basis for "normal" infant motor development. However, the development of posture, strength and coordination have been examined in relation to types of infant feeding, and it is not known whether this strategy is associated with an increased risk of musculoskeletal development (Alcock, [B2]). In our study, sharing a bed at night was a significant risk factor for having moderate to severe sagittal and coronal imbalance. This factor is more likely to be associated with infants' increased motor development that is put under a great demand for exploring the environment than an adopted feeding strategy, and the development of musculoskeletal system. The exact mechanism of developing musculoskeletal alignment by exposing and sleeping in a lateral position was not identified in this study; it may be associated with developing musculoskeletal coordination and motor development. However, our study shows that the tendency to sleep in a lateral position was influenced by a maternal history of sleep disorders. A previous study reported that one of the most important factors of developing sleep disorders was the amount of sleeping time in the supine position (Chin et al., [B9]). Therefore, the development of musculoskeletal alignment can be impacted by sleeping with a caregiver's excessive load or by insufficient sleep. There is no evidence to support a correlation between breast-feeding and musculoskeletal development. However, it is possible that the lateral sleeping position had a more critical impact on musculoskeletal development in combination with breast feeding. The impact of caregiving environment factors in our study was limited by absence of high-quality studies. We expected that caregiving environment factors including breast-feeding practices, family sleeping habits, and parental attitudes would be identified, particularly with regard to the definition of the
