Ports: In the near future, space travel is starting to become a reality. Humans embark on journeys through space to find new resources and new lands to colonize. A short time ago it was all about the stars, but with so many people going into space, there's more danger than ever. A group of humans take refuge on the ship 'Shipped' when a freak storm forces the ship to crash in ice. They embark on a desperate journey to the nearest port to escape the frozen wasteland. The reason they're going into space in the first place is to mine for valuable resources, but the meteor shower that shattered their ship interfered with their ship's navigation system and the crew is lost. It's up to the player to help them survive. Players can connect a second Vive, HMDs and controllers to the system. It supports SteamVR tracking. What's next for Shipped? What's new:

Crayon Physics Deluxe is a puzzle video game developed by Crayon Tatsu and published by Wired Productions. The video game in itself is a download, with all the music and animations pre-made and either manually layered or generated as a result of looking at game footage. The "dewdrop picture" interface, which features crudely designed user interface has been compared to a modern-day DOS or Warez distribution. In the game, the player controls a softball-sized rectangular block and the goal is for it to squeeze down the narrowest passage possible with the myriad of surfaces, sloped or angled walls, doorways, and obstacles that to humans would be virtually impossible to negotiate. To do so requires the use of a guide of various shapes, colors, and compositions to be placed on the various obstacles. When the block is pushed directly into a wall, it explodes and the player is eliminated from the game. Originally released for Microsoft Windows in February 2007, a month later, the PC version was later provided for download on Mac OS X and Linux for the first time later that year. With a December 2008 release, a "Premium" version was made available which restricted gameplay to users who purchased it, locked the interface to see the procedurally-generated dewdrop interface, and, most prominently to the game's virtual currency, gave the player an "ultimate hero" to control, which was later made public to all users later in 2009. The game has been met with a positive response from the gaming press and blogs, with praise directed towards the gameplay, graphics, interface, and music, while concern was given to the inclusion of advertising which separates the player from money. The game uses the concept of procedural generation over four difficulty levels that are created by carving everything that is generated into an infinite grid, where the player would be exploring as they would make their way forward. Gameplay The player, which represents a rectangular-shaped brick, moves through the obstacle course, with its goal being to navigate the wall of the game's landscape. To do so, the player manipulates a line which uses its butt-end to visualize the tightest route to the end of the level. Obstacles decelerate the block's movement at various rates, with one motion offset with each block from the butt-end of the player. The brick's size grows as the player approaches its end as well. The object of the game is to make it to the opposite side

Worcester Minutemen (PG) Second Annual Tournament from November 17, 2014 to December 1, 2014 LBF Riverside Park Worcester, MA. The scene: It was a balmy October afternoon as the Worcester native, John Rudkin, enjoyed a football game at the Lower Nichols Field in Worcester, Massachusetts, something quite the opposite of what he was used to as well as that game being played. The occasion is the LBF Riverside Park, Worcester Minutemen (PG) second annual tournament. The unique format involves a plastic wiffle ball, which the players strike at the special field and the winners are declared at the conclusion of the game. Recycled plastic wiffle balls are the trademark of the Worcester Minutemen.
