However, considering that the effects of sex hormones on females are less clear than those on males, there could be more differences in later life between male and female rhesus monkeys. For example, in very old females the timing of the preovulatory LH surge in the cycle is significantly earlier and the duration of the LH surge is significantly shorter than in males \[@B56\]. It is also more likely that females will be less likely to use social learning, even if they are provided with adequate social support \[@B57\]. Whether the differences in the development of olfactory changes reported in females in this study are because of ovarian hormones or due to the gender of the ape remains to be determined in future studies. As discussed, the phenomenon of chimpanzee as opposed to rhesus macaque copulation appears to be closely linked to the male's role in mating competition \[@B6\,\@B7\]. Since the latter can be more aggressive towards females than male conspecifics, other mechanisms apart from the direct effects of hormones could exist for this change. Furthermore, in rhesus females, and to some extent in chimpanzees, sexual encounters can be postponed to older ages compared with males, as discussed \[@B3\,\@B6\,\@B7\]. Also, long-term stress from the need
