The economist Aziz Poonawala in 1965: "The liberalisation is a multi-track project. In the first phase the balance of payments, trade, exchange rate, employment and inflation should be improved. In the second phase the balance of tariffs, sales taxes and ad valorem duties are to be liberalised, the ad valorem rates of duty should be readjusted, and a more progressive income tax is to be introduced. And in the third phase, through further relaxations, an increase in production, an increase in employment and a reduction in prices are to be achieved." I wonder if this was the blueprint for the liberalisation that the Janata government embarked upon in December, 1991? In 1971, when he made this statement, India was not facing an external shocks in terms of balance of payments, trade, inflation, employment and exchange rate. To begin with, India followed the vision set by most economists in the West, that of having a "closed" economy. This created problems for India. When you have a closed economy, capital is not moving in or out of the country and we cannot move our foreign reserves out or invest them in foreign markets. So, the default was to raise money externally and to build up the foreign reserves. In essence, Indians were running "hoard". As a corollary to this, international companies were prevented from investing in India. In his book
