One hand on the grip of her pistol. On autopilot, she was thinking about what the hell her father would make of all this, and she had to admit that the odds of him being a believer in angels were pretty damn good. Even if they weren't half-as-evil as their reputation, they were here nonetheless, and it was a major buzzkill to have one in her house. Upstairs, she paused with her hand on the closet door as she considered that maybe her father should go to this and see for himself. And then she thought about what she'd left behind in the closet and told herself to stop being stupid. Seconds later she had her sheathed sword in her hand and was out the door and down the stairs—before she even thought about heading to the kitchen. The fact was, he'd probably better see this with his own eyes. Because if he didn't, she was going to tell him every last detail. Including who had told her. Xhex had no idea what to expect upon opening the door, and was an absolute mess of nerves and anticipation once she did, with her body going all cold and tingly as if she were hearing the trumpets of the damned. She knew then that she'd been right. The others were out here, too, and somehow the fact that he had allowed them to be around was just as devastating a blow to her psyche as if he had actually sent them. The house looked exactly as it had the night she left: the furniture,
