Field The present invention relates to graphics rendering systems, in particular to rendering systems that operate on video data. 2. Prior Art Computer graphics offers realistic imaging techniques for both games and the movies. Virtual reality techniques provides the ability to simulate experiences in an environment modelled by the graphics processor. Often however, there is required the use of other sophisticated multimedia assets for which the graphics system must co-operate; in particular including a sound system. A multimedia rendering system supports all operations that are supported in a video processing system. For example, rendering operations like over encoding, super encoding, cropping, encoding, colour space conversion, video scaling, printing, and combination with other graphic information (e.g. the frames of a video bit stream) are used to generate a multimedia type image. A video encoder typically involves a data structure referred to as a picture buffer (also known as a frame buffer) that stores pixels for display. In the absence of any rendering operation within the encoder, the values stored in the frame buffer are simply read out for display. The picture buffer is generally addressed for the purpose of reading the colour value for each pixel on a display device. The pixels are stored in the address order provided by the frame buffer. In addition, for each pixel addressed, there is a separate colour or "colour intensity" value allocated to the pixel. Additional formats for specifying pixel colour include luminance, chrominance, and luma/chroma. The specification of pixel colour therefore comprises the frame buffer address and the colour intensity value. A number of approaches are used in current encoding systems to achieve more efficient video encoding, such as summarisation, indexing (also known as inter-frame encoding), and pre-filtering. Summarisation involves scanning through the picture buffer for video data and then recording a summarised version of the data in the picture buffer. Redundant portions are left in the frame buffer rather than being thrown away. The summarised data is used for encoding the next picture. Summarisation requires large changes to be made to the frame buffer and therefore, to the picture buffer accordingly. Hence, summarisation cannot be incorporated within a hardware video decoder. Inter-frame encoding takes advantage of the fact

In his speech introducing the General Data Protection Regulation (“GDPR”) on 25 May 2016, Michel Barnier, the Chief EU Data Protection Officer, said: [The GDPR] will require each one of us to be responsible for what is done in the name of the EU and/or our national community. It is true that many people will be responsible for the GDPR in one way or another, in particular as regards the implementation of the law. But that responsibility extends much further than the mere duty of implementing the rules or exercising the right of erasure. We are all ultimately responsible for whether a breach has taken place and for taking effective action to address it. The GPPR provides a number of enforcement mechanisms. It requires that all personal data that an organisation collects, uses or processes must be handled lawfully, fairly and in a transparent way. It requires that organisations are subject to detailed obligations relating to security and data protection. Its rules apply to all the data that an organisation holds about individuals. There are general obligations concerning the organisational administrative and technical arrangements and obligations relating to the integrity and confidentiality of personal data. It is possible to compel a legal entity to fulfil obligations owed to its direct and indirect data subjects. Of course, in addition to the entities set out in Article 5(1) it applies to any natural or legal person. There are a number of cases which involve the application of these rules. But they also involve the failure to be responsible for what is done in the name of the EU or the community. For instance, a company is sold to another company. The new company retains the customer list and fails to disclose its acquisition to the data subjects on a truth in terms notice. Even if the data subjects are entitled to demand that their information is handled lawfully, fairly and transparently, and even if they can enforce the obligation against the data subject, they are not the subject of the unfair conduct. It is also possible to apply the data protection rules to data that a data controller has transferred to a controller, to avoid its obligations.
