Managing innovations: the art of the impossible. Innovation is one of the two new and very disturbing developments of the last three decades, alongside technology. As with technology, it is unlikely that any single organization or industry will be able to control and effectively manage it. However, when those who find themselves at the receiving end of the innovation wave find ways to measure it or to manage it, and develop the necessary skills, it may be the best of all possible worlds. At the moment, the most important innovation is the "green revolution" in agriculture, which is so beneficial for the world and for our own pocketbooks that it may well be the best thing that ever happened to mankind.Q: How to execute a command in the future (in the UI thread, for later processing), but I'm running into some issues. I've tried: var child_process: prequire('child_process'); var child = child_process.spawn('command', ['args'], { cwd: './' }); child.on('close', function (code) { alert('The command was successful'); }); and also: var timeout(function() { alert('The command was successful'); }, 5000); and: var execFile = require('child_process').execFile; var child = execFile('executed-command', [], {maxBuffer: 32 * 1024 * 1024}, function(err, stdout, stderr) { if (stdout!== '') { alert(stdout); } }); None of these approaches yield any output, and I'm assuming this is because nodeJS spawns the command in a process, and since it runs asynchronously it doesn't know when your callback function finishes. So the best way to handle this would be to execute the command in a separate thread, and wait on it to finish. Node.js has something that makes this relatively easy, but it's better explained with an example. First you need to
