I have a server program that collects data from a program and sends it to a listening client. I'm wondering if I should use a non-blocking socket or not. I've looked around and there seems to be two main cases where one might want a non-blocking socket: When the incoming connection is for real-time communication When the client won't really know when the server will have data to send to it. What are other cases, and when do you decide to use one over the other? A: A general rule of thumb is that a socket is non-blocking if you are going to do something with the data on the socket. For example, if a client is expecting a response from a server, then a non-blocking socket allows the client to send that request and await that response. If the socket is not going to be used for something that will be affected by the size of the data on the socket, then you don't need to use non-blocking sockets. For example, if you are only sending a message size of a few bytes to the client, then using a non-blocking socket is not necessary. # frozen_string_literal: true RSpec.describe Docker::V1::Privileged::BuildArgument, '#parse' do subject { described_class.new(data).to_s } let(:data) { 'argument'
