What's new:

A weekly report of new DRM software enables the online check for illegally copied materials and personal information. The New Oriental shares more details on its reactions to the huge task. In China, it is realistic to assume that plenty of people have downloaded pirated goods without permission, so it is highly likely for their personal information to be accidentally leaked. The risk is generally posed as a very serious problem by many observers, claiming this has become a security issue for some subscribers. The company claims not to have noticed whether any of its users were negatively affected by the detection program, because this does not track the personal information that is checked by DRM device. According to the report, about 80% of all users are in the process of updating the software currently, while the rest have installed the operating system on the legitimate copy. It comes as no surprise that these people have not been disturbed, because the update was not carried out. The problem is more important for those with the illegally obtained goods, whose personal information is getting through the detection program. According to statistics, about 400,000 users have had their data checked in this short while. If the investigation is continued by the software, and the user has violated the law, the consumer can use his or her processor to modify the software. According to the report, this is all about 500,000 devices. "We are shocked to learn that some products have already been copied, and we are still under the shock period," said Chen Yitong, the general manager of New Oriental, which makes the user to jointly share the price of the goods. "We will pay attention to these issues. The results of DRM should be easy to view and share. No matter what, we would not grow careless toward users who have otherwise behaved well." New Oriental, known for its DRM software software, also lost a report on its successful completion of the authorized and legal vendor business rank list. According to the website, the company has expanded the level of DRM protection for its authorized purchase. An officially authorized manufacturer gives support and good business relations to the company, and shares the products. The intent of the report is to inform the members of the authorized list, so that they may support this plan to protect the legal goods. The licensing framework itself was able to give users more freedom to shop online and more titles to play. The website does not specify the name of the authorized vendor, though it
