[Irving] [A & E] When I first heard that a new fantasy MMO was in the works, I thought: "Oh, please no. I play MMOs to get my fvckin' adrenaline rushing." The only time I'd ever actively play a game in which you have to actually tread through land, instead of sprinting through a single area, was D&D back in the 1990s. As I neared the end of the trial version, I had gathered enough clues to anticipate just how terrible the game would turn out to be. I couldn't even call it a beta, because I had seen the game-play video before. It was rife with typical MMO problems, all of which the game's creators seemed to blindly assume would be magically fixed as the game progressed: combat that doesn't work, bare-bones dungeons, and a whole lot of "elden" (translation: "Old"). I won't even get into how much the name "Tarnished" is annoying. But, what with the trial version of the game closing just two days after I'd found it, I had to give in and download it. Yes, it's that bad. But I couldn't help myself. I just had to see where this fish-out-of-water player drama would lead us. So, I played, and I had to say, "Okay, just keep on trucking." I'm not ready to call it "fun," but "bearable" and "barely tolerable" are probably fair descriptions. But I'm not sure it's worth playing more than a few times. I didn't find myself caring about the plot, either. The storyline consists of a few plot holes. None of the "good" characters were brought out into the main story. There was a timeline problem: Were I and the other people I found in the game included in this far future game? I have no idea. None of the quest objectives or quest rewards were really explained or explained at all. Instead, I was given a quest and then dragged along with it until the final quest-related event. I found it quite galling that bff6bb2d33
