E. Coleman, provide for a battery-powered popper for popping the vinyl labels from the sides of bottles, cans, and the like, which can be reused. The device includes a hollow cylindrical body with a larger end and a smaller end. The larger end houses the popper, which is comprised of a motor and a gear train, the smaller end is adapted to receive the bottle, can, or the like and is slotted to receive a bottle, can, or the like and to permit the use of both hands to pop the label off the bottle, can, or the like. The cylindrical body is double walled with the slot being defined by a transverse wall of the body. The slot has a spring, which biases the end of the cylindrical body which receives the bottle, can, or the like to an upright position. A removable pin, which is positioned at the proximal end of the slot, holds the slot in a closed position and enables the popper to be thrown. The removable pin is used to apply forces to the bottle, can, or the like for moving the bottle, can, or the like to pop the vinyl label off the bottle, can, or the like. The pin is held at the distal end of the slot and is positioned at a location determined by the internal geometry of the slot. Typically, the distal end of the pin is aligned with the distal end of the slot so that a user of the device may apply force to the device by holding the popper and applying force to the pin. Thus, the pin must be disengaged from the slot before the bottle, can, or the like can be grasped. Because the size of the pin is typically less than the width of the slot, the pin can often be easily lost. If the pin is lost, the popper cannot be used. Additionally, the slots often become worn and loose due to repeated use. This results in increased play and decreased friction. As a result, the pin may "stick" in the slot and additional axial force applied to the popper may not disengage the popper. Another problem is that the cylindrical body of the popper is comprised of molded plastic
