Monthly Archives: March 2012 So I was whining the other night to a friend, on the cycle of feeling out of place in “my” world, when in all likelihood I should just be looking out into what’s right in front of me. So I was talking about the problem... “It’s like I’m in a new world. I feel like I’m a stranger, just passing through. And everyone around me can look at me like I’m crazy.” When something goes wrong, I realize I feel like I’m the only one who notices, and because of that, I start to feel like an outsider. Like I’m a stranger in a strange land. When I’m depressed, I feel like a stranger. No matter how many miles I ride, or how many positive things I accomplish, it’s still me in a world that I don’t belong in. I can’t think of anything more cowardly than to be depressed, and yet I have a thousand examples of people with more courage than I have who give that name to depression. So the question is...does my depression define me, or does it simply narrow my scope? I was just talking to an old friend about divorce, or more accurately, the obstacles we’re facing in our relationship right now. And I realized that our friendship really doesn’t depend on our relationship. It’s the kind of friendship that’s only possible because we’re single. It’s the kind of friendship where you can say stuff like “I’m really glad that us being apart right now gives us the freedom to be honest with each other. It’s a good thing we don’t need to judge each other as couples, because otherwise we’d never have become friends.” So what if you had to leave your relationships forever? What if in five, ten, or even twenty years, they had irreconcil
