A: On a good day, it might be possible. If you create a user group with the account on the Google server and no password or other barriers, it should be possible to grant access to the account, then import the credentials of the subdomain into that account. It's also possible to export/import settings, though you probably don't want to do that. I'm not saying this is the case here. My suspicion is that whoever is doing the importing/exporting is abusing the service. Edit: I have a team running 18 sites with a handful of users on each. The bulk of the users are not even connected to the Google Apps account. It works as expected. Edit 2: OK, I just tried the following: I created a team with a user on the Google Apps account. I entered the subdomain. I went to the advanced settings and pulled the credentials from the subdomain from the billing account. I then went to the Google Apps account, clicked the link for the team and clicked "Import" for all the members. No dice. Edit 3: OK, I've expanded the question. I would really like to know why Google is not allowing the use of the user credentials of their own apps. I do the same thing on my own domain, and it works perfectly. I am just frustrated that I have to track down a live web developer to figure out that there is a problem with one of the simplest things I can do. Q: Strange memory leak when serializing/deserializing List I have a very strange problem with an List serializing with Json.net. I have the following code:

class MyClass { public List MyIntList { get; set; } public MyClass() { MyIntList = new List(); } public static void Main(string[] args) { MyClass mc = new MyClass(); mc.MyIntList.Add(1); mc.MyIntList.Add(1); MemoryStream ms = new MemoryStream(); var json

The oocyte maurizio Battista il mio secondo matrimonio torrentView It has been 26 years since Ronald Reagan signed the Federal Marriage Amendment into law, but things are not the same for same-sex couples today. Gay couples are still fighting for the Constitutional protection that the passage of the amendment denied them. There are still more than 120 states that have laws that deny married couples from being recognized as married under the law, despite the public impression of a majority of states that supports this. A majority of Americans have a false idea about what the law really says, so let's look at what the law says today. The Federal Marriage Amendment was a constitutional amendment that was signed into law by President Reagan on June 28, 1996, to amend the Constitution to prohibit the federal government from recognizing any marriage that is not between one man and one woman. The Amendment passed Congress with the support of all but two states, Vermont and Rhode Island. Vermont had a public referendum on the Amendment but it failed to pass. Rhode Island, however, was the only state to reject the Amendment, because its legislature repealed its existing anti-gay marriage law in 1992. The Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) was an Act of Congress that was signed into law by President Clinton on September 21, 1996. The purpose of DOMA was to define marriage as between a man and a woman for the purpose of Federal benefits and programs. The federal government recognizes only marriage between one man and one woman and does not recognize any other marriage including same-sex marriage. The U.S. Supreme Court has refused to hear any cases related to DOMA since a previous case was decided on procedural grounds in 2013. The much anticipated Supreme Court decision striking down DOMA was released on June 26, 2015. The Supreme Court unanimously held that DOMA is unconstitutional, despite the fact that a majority of states 6d1f23a050
