Technique variation has been shown to be a problem in the interpretation of exercise treadmill testing (ETT) results in the detection of left main coronary artery disease (LMCA), as well as in mortality. However, factors influencing the sensitivity and specificity of these tests, such as heart rate, maximal treadmill stress, number of stress levels, and duration of exercise are unknown. This investigation aimed to determine the effect of heart rate, treadmill stress level, and duration of exercise on the accuracy of ETT in detection of LMCA disease. We retrospectively compared clinical data on all 26 patients who had LMCA disease and 28 patients who had LMCA disease as determined by coronary arteriography (CA), with the results of consecutive ETT carried out at the time of CA. The results of ETT showed LMCA disease in 13 (50%) of 26 patients with proven LMCA disease on CA. Heart rate at rest, maximal stress level attained, number of stress levels performed, and duration of exercise were significantly different in this patient group when compared with the control group. By receiver-operating characteristic analysis, heart rate at rest, number of stress levels performed, number of stress levels achieved, and duration of exercise were determined to have significant influence on the accuracy of the ETT test in the diagnosis of LMCA disease. In addition, heart rate at rest, maximal exercise level attained, number of exercise levels performed, and duration of exercise were significantly different between patients with exercise-induced chest pain and those without exercise-induced chest pain in the detection of LMCA disease. Our study showed that heart rate at rest, number of stress levels performed, level of exercise attained, and duration of exercise influenced the sensitivity and specificity of the ETT in the detection of LMCA disease. #SQL injection ``` Description: SQL injection is one of the most vulnerable issues that you can create if you are not careful enough with your code and inputs. This will inject malicious script into your database. For example: SELECT * FROM user Where "user" is a variable that is placed in the URL and should not exist in the database. SQL injection can affect the server (denying it to work), and if it's in 6d1f23a050
